1. In the following excerpt from Doyle's The Sign of Four Jonathan Small describes the outbreak of the Mutiny. Discuss his views and comment on how they differ widely from historical context.

Well, I was never in luck's way long. Suddenly, without a note of warning, the great mutiny broke upon us. One month India lay as still and peaceful, to all appearance, as Surrey or Kent; the next there were two hundred thousand black devils let loose, and the country was a perfect hell.

2. John Ruskin and Coventry Patmore are nineteenth-century (Victorian critics) who present an ideal image of the middle-class (Victorian home) in their works. Discuss their views on home and compare them to the representation of the two homes that appear in Brontë's Wuthering Heights.
