Part I: Answer ONE only of the TWO questions below in an essay form: (16 Marks)

1- In the post war GDR (German Democratic Republic), the fate of Coriolanus was framed by a specific mix of political, social and economic pressures. Verify this statement with a special reference to Bertolt Brecht's Coriolan. Provide examples to support your argument.

2- In their essay "Figures in the Corpus: Theories of Influence and Intertextuality", Jay Clayton and Eric Rothstein maintained that "[i]n Kristeva's usage, the intersection of textual surfaces in a literary word can never be circumscribed, is open to endless dissemination". Elaborate more on Kristeva's contribution to the concept of intertextuality with a special reference to any two texts (one is an adaptation of the other) that verify her arguments.

Part II: Answer TWO only of the THREE questions below in an essay form: (12 Marks Each)

1- In his article entitled "Antigones", George Steiner argues that "[t]he line of philosophical, political, and poetic analyses and invocations of the myth and of the variants on Sophocles which have followed through the ages, shows no sign of being broken". Substantiate with a special reference to any adaptation of Sophocles' Antigone.

2- In "Anger's my meat": Feeding, dependency & Aggression in Shakespeare's Coriolanus" (2009), Janet Adelman argues, "[f]or Coriolanus, as for his mother, nobility consists precisely in not eating: he twice imagines starving himself honorably to death before asking for food". Elaborate further on the metaphor of food and dependence introduced by Adelman, with a special reference to Shakespeare's Coriolanus.

3- The enduring appeal of Sophocles' Antigone greatly lies in its exploration of universal themes. Validate this argument with a special reference to Nehad Selaiha's "Antigone in Palestine: Where are we? In Thebes, Jenin or Ramallah?".

Good Luck
