Research reveals which emotions make content 'go viral'

The quest for viral content is central to modern marketing, with academic research showing that emotional arousal is key to virality. A 2012 study by Berger and Milkman, analyzing 7,000 New York Times articles, found that emotionally charged content—particularly inspiring, awe-inducing, or anger-evoking—was more likely to be widely shared. Notably, high emotional intensity, whether positive or negative, predicted higher email shares than neutral content.

A 2013 YouTube-focused study by Guadagno et al. confirmed similar findings: content that provoked strong emotional responses, regardless of being positive or negative, had a higher chance of being shared.

Additionally, Libert and Tynski (2013) analyzed viral images on Reddit using Plutchik's Wheel of Emotion. They discovered that surprise and anticipation were the most common emotional triggers in highly shared content.

Across platforms, emotional intensity—especially surprise, awe, anger, or inspiration—is a strong predictor of viral potential.

Question One: (40 marks)

a) Based on the case study, what types of emotions are most effective in making content go viral, and why? Provide examples (20 marks).

b) What four advices would you give to marketers who want their campaigns to "go viral" based on these research findings (20 marks)?
